ABSTRACT

Computers are electronic devices which are created to work for human, but there are people who use the computer system to harm and affect others without any legal measures to punish such criminal offences. The Computer-related Crime Act. B.E. 2550 was enacted to cope with that problem. This Act sets out the liability of the Internet Service Providers. The purpose of this thesis is to study the scope of the Internet Service Providers' liabilities and business effects on them by comparing between Thai law and the related international laws.

According to the result of the research, the aforesaid law is nebulous in both the definitions of Internet Service Providers and scope of their liabilities. The Act sets out the scope of liabilities without having considered the type of the Internet Service Providers. The author is of opinion that the issuance of the Notification on the regulations of the Internet Service Providers' liabilities to be in accordance with the type of the Service Providers, and the amendment of Article 15 of the said Act would be the appropriate solutions to the problems arising from the implementation of this law.
